Where can I find additional information about copyright and courseware?

Loyola University Chicago provides general information about copyright at its web page Copyright Resources. The web page includes information about what is covered by copyright, exceptions, fair use, and obtaining permission. Other helpful websites include the following:

Know Your Copy Rights is a very useful general guide for determining permissible use of copyrighted material. The guide covers topics such as linking, licensed use, fair use, works in the public domain, and display or performance of works under the TEACH Act. Source: Association of Research Libraries.

Using Copyrighted Works in Your Teaching – FAQ is a helpful list of common questions and answers about copyright in an educational setting. This guide discusses typical uses of copyrighted material in face-to-face classrooms and on course web pages. The guide covers an array of topics, including use of your own copyrighted work, display or performance of a copyrighted work, licensed use, fair use, and seeking permission. Source: Association of Research Libraries.

United States Copyright Office has extensive information about copyright law. In particular, Circulars cover numerous topics, such as works-made-for-hire, copyright duration, reproduction of works by educators and librarians, and investigating the copyright status of a work.

Copyright Term and the Public Domain in the United States is a helpful list identifying when works are in the public domain. It is hosted on Cornell University’s website.